Doshisha University

Purpose of the Graduate School of Global Studies

Doshisha University's Graduate School of Global Studies (GSGS) is an independent graduate school launched in April 2010 in response to the pressing urgency of issues such as transnational migration, refugee flows, regional conflict and the environment. Solving such large-scale problems requires a combination of regional and global perspectives, and a willingness to use multiple perspectives from the humanities and social sciences. Consequently the GSGS brings to bear both regional and global expertise ranging across an array of disciplines to address pressing issues in the world today. Rather than pursuing vague generalizations, GSGS encourages students to pursue focused research projects that investigate how individual case studies help illuminate broader global trends. GSGS particularly promotes studies that cross disciplines and national boundaries and that search for larger connections. As a result, GSGS seeks students with a clear focus, research agenda, and willingness to challenge the limits of any one discipline or approach. Master's and doctoral students belong to one of the following three clusters:

American Studies

For more than a century the United States has played an outsized role on the global stage. Japan has had a particularly complex relationship with American culture, society and politics. The American Studies Cluster therefore encourages students to examine the United States from a global perspective. Faculty expertise is wide-ranging, from political philosophy, peace studies, gender and sexuality studies, to anthropology, religious studies, history, African Diaspora studies, and film studies. Through classes and faculty direction, students develop a deep understanding of American history, society, culture and thought, as well as the multiple transnational intersections and encounters that have shaped the United States.

Contemporary Asian Studies

Faculty expertise in this cluster centers on China, the Korean Peninsula, Japan and Southeast Asia. At the same time, students are encouraged to see Asia from both regional and global perspectives to gain a more sophisticated understanding of the culture and life of people living in the area. Today's Asia faces numerous political, economic, and social issues, many of which are difficult to solve. But it is also a rewarding challenge to contemplate these issues and seek solutions. The cluster welcomes students eager to think and discuss about East Asian society and people.

Global Society Studies

This cluster addresses issues ranging from human security, conflict prevention, peace building, development and poverty to transnational migration, multicultural education, gender, citizenship, racism, class inequalities and environmental challenges. With diverse disciplinary backgrounds and areas of specialization (Africa, the Middle East and Europe), faculty members investigate various contemporary global issues, flexibly applying both disciplinary approach and area studies. Another feature of this international cluster is that it accepts many students from Central Asia and African countries as part of the human resources development support project of the Japan International Cooperation Agency (JICA).

Areas of Study

Possible Research Topics:

Diverse and Interdisciplinary Curriculum

The Graduate School of Global Studies (GSGS) consists of three clusters (American Studies, Contemporary Asian Studies, Global Society Studies), but aside from a few required elective courses, students can design their own curriculum in free and cross-disciplinary ways. Required elective courses such as “Introduction to Global Studies” and “Theories and Methods” familiarize students with a wide range of contemporary issues from global perspectives, while offering foundational knowledge and methodologies for research. GSGS also offers many elective courses that cover diverse areas, issues, and disciplines, encouraging students to design their course of study through the detailed guidance of the faculty. We conduct about half of the courses in English, which is another distinguished characteristic of our curriculum.

Dealing with contemporary global issues requires not only theoretical and specialized knowledge but also practical efforts to solve the world’s problems. GSGS therefore appoints professional experts in journalism and international cooperation, and also incorporates fieldwork and internship experience into the curriculum so as to cultivate people who can assume a leading role in international institutions, think-tanks, NGOs and the media.

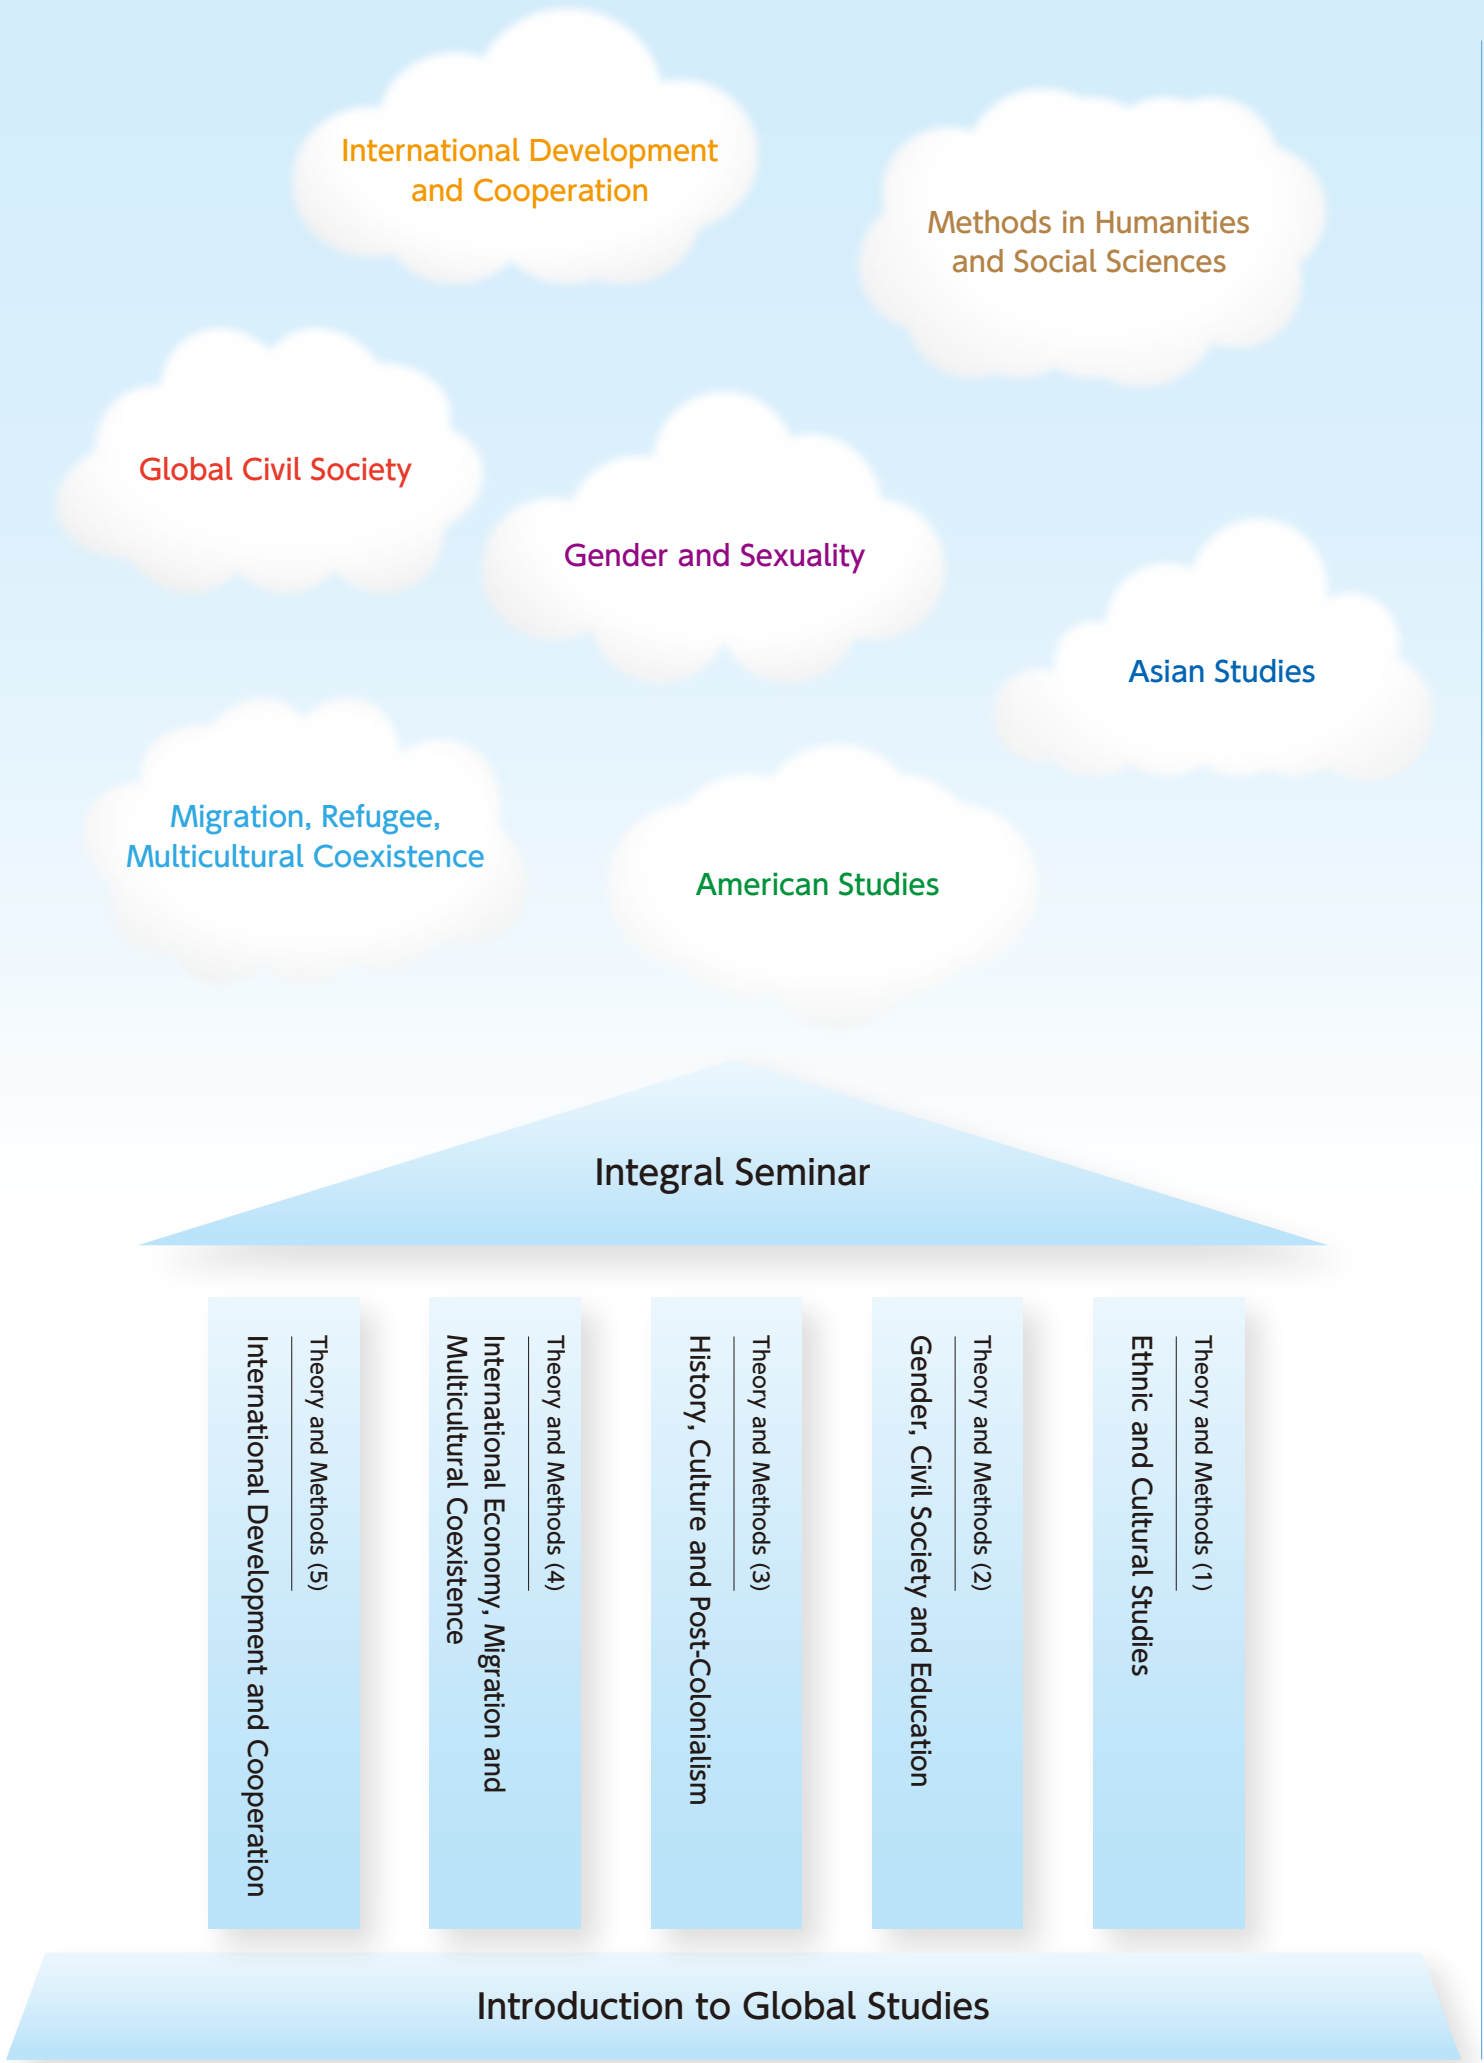

Examples of Recent Student Research Topics

- Evolution of Fandom in the Cyberspace: in Case Studies
- Quemoian Studies and Quemoian Identity: An approach from Immigrants
- Relevance between Sino-Japanese Sister Cities and Sino-Japanese Diplomacy: A case study on Nanjing and Nagoya's relationship
- The Narrative of Trans Men and Trans Masculine People Looking Back Their Lives
- Applying Self-management to Muslim Diabetics: Fasting of the month of Ramadan

Small Group Instruction to Deepen Awareness

The goal of graduate school education is for students to complete a Master’s thesis (or Seminar Paper) or a Ph.D. dissertation. The Graduate School of Global Studies (GSGS) provides small group education that facilitates close communication between faculty and students and meticulous mentoring until the completion of the theses. In particular, seminars offer students detailed advice according to their individual awareness and needs, from technical aspects of how to write an academic paper to advice on thesis structure and fieldwork. In addition, each cluster regularly holds progress report sessions (Integral Seminar) for students to present their thesis outlines to the faculty members.

International Research Environment

Communication with International Students

One of the distinguishing characteristics of the Graduate School of Global Studies (GSGS) is that international students comprise approximately half of its student body. In addition to students from China, GSGS accepts many students from Afghanistan and African countries as part of the Japanese government’s human resources development support project managed by the Japan International Cooperation Agency (JICA). The mix of students from different historical, cultural and religious backgrounds provides stimulating and invaluable opportunities to engage in multicultural communication.

Number of Students Enrolled
[GSGS Master’s / Doctoral Program, 162 Students in total]

(as of April 1, 2025)

Wide Range of International Partnerships

Upholding “Internationalism” as one of its founding principles, Doshisha University currently has academic partnership agreements with more than 200 institutions in about 45 countries. Graduate students are encouraged to take advantage of this extensive international network in studying abroad and research activities. In addition, GSGS actively pursues student exchanges and joint research activities through its own individual partnerships with domestic and overseas universities and research institutions.

Wealth of Support Services

Financial Support

Doshisha University provides an extensive range of scholarship programs to graduate students, including the “Scholarship for Young Doctoral Students/Researchers” (awarded to up to a maximum 18 students in the Graduate School of Global Studies (GSGS)) that provides an amount equivalent to full university fees for three years to doctoral students aged 33 or younger at the time of admission, virtually making doctoral programs free of charge, as well as the university’s own tuition reduction system. In addition, students are eligible to apply for scholarships offered by the Japan Student Services Organization and private and local public organizations through the university’s comprehensive financial support system (*for more details, please see the GSGS website).

We also have the teaching assistant (TA) and research assistant (RA) system which enables graduate students to engage in paid assistant work in education and research. Working as a TA or an RA gives graduate students opportunities to gain teaching and research experience as well as financial resources to support their research activities.

Fieldwork

GSGS encourages students to conduct actual on-site survey and research in the area of their interest, and offers travel subsidies for fieldwork and other off-campus activities up to 150,000 yen. The subsidies help facilitate their research activities.

Message from Graduates

A Comprehensive Experience Of Learning With and From Each Other

YOW Hiu Tung

(Graduated MA program in 2021)

With a background in sociology, I came to Japan with an interest in studying gender and employment. The Graduate School of Global Studies (GS) provides an invaluable platform for international students to study Japan in the context of globalisation in a supportive and vibrant educational environment, through its bilingual learning mediums, multicultural and interdisciplinary graduate programmes.

My Master's study at GS had been greatly rewarding. I was fortunate to be able to conduct my research under the guidance of experienced scholars across different fields of expertise, and the companionship of fellow students of diverse backgrounds. The intellectual and cultural exchanges had boarded my horizon and deepened my understanding of a wider range of issues. Together, we ventured beyond our research and methodologies, and were inspired by new perspectives and ideas that often benefited each other's studies in unexpected ways.

I had written my Master's thesis on Japanese women working in non-regular employment by looking at the prevalence of women in the non-regular sector from the perspective of women themselves. Exploring beyond unsatisfying working conditions, the incredible sense of agency and resilience these women demonstrated through their actions and decisions to navigate their lives, in the context of neoliberalism, persistent patriarchal norms, and various structural and institutional forces, had inspired much reflection on ourselves, the societies we live in, and social sufferings and struggles.

After completing my Master's studies, I am continuing my academic pursuit as a doctoral student at GS. Here, I wish to play a part in creating a global and academically stimulating environment for us learn and grow together, as academics and to be better persons.

Debut into a graduate school after working as a member of society

TSUJI Naomi

(Graduated MA program in 2021)

At the end of September three years ago, the company where I worked suddenly told me that I would be transferred from Tokyo to the Kansai region. I decided that this was my opportunity to enroll in a graduate school, and the following spring I became a working graduate student. As the old expression says, "at fifty I set my heart on learning." Ever since, I have been captivated by the joy of learning, and, after earning a master's degree, I enrolled in the doctoral program where I am continuing my studies.

The Graduate School of Global Studies offers a wide variety of courses following the latest research trends, and I am always enlightened by the comments and advice from the faculty. Most of my classmates are young international students, but there are also others. One senior earned a doctorate after retirement, which makes me feel I still have so much to learn. As students can also choose courses offered by other graduate schools in the university, I have also taken some courses at other schools that interest me, such as courses on cultural policies and aesthetics. Moreover, the program also offers many courses taught by researchers from other universities and institutions, which broadens not only my learning but also my network.

My own interest is in historical studies focused on cultural assets. Every day I read books and articles, examine historical documents one by one, and write. By continuing this work I have broadened my intellectual horizons, and I have also used my work experiences as a businessperson in new ways. It's up to me whether, or how much, I work, so I don't feel too strained (although my professor may be angry to hear this and tell me to take my studies more seriously).

Enrolling in the graduate school has transformed my life. Now, I am at an age when I should know a lot about life, but every day I still enjoy having so much more I still can learn.

Career Path

The Graduate School of Global Studies (GSGS) aims to cultivate human resources that contribute to the promotion of international exchange and understanding between multicultural societies. Our graduates work actively in a variety of fields including international organizations, public institutions, international business and journalism. There are also many students who go on to the Doctoral program or overseas graduate schools.
